Most of us in the Narcotics Anonymous fellowship find that besides becoming and remaining clean, one of the most difficult parts of our recovery process is the restoration of our personal relationships. Our difficulties with handling our relationships are evident by the many times relationships became the topic at discussion meetings. Many of us have come to feel a sense of "powerlessness" in our dealings with others, but yet have trouble "surrendering" this powerlessness. Thus, just as with our past using behavior, our lives become unmanageable. Most of us do not want to admit that our addiction has affected our ability to handle our relationships effectively. Pride and denial, two major characteristics of our disease of addiction, tell us that our difficulties are the fault of the other person(s). We find it very hard to admit our own fears, mistakes and weaknesses. Subsequently, we focus on the shortcomings we perceive in others. The reality is that just like with our past compulsive using behavior, we are not alone with this malady. We listened at meetings, read that N.A. literature, talked with our sponsor, and soon began to realize that there were many other recovering addicts struggling with the same feelings and conflicts regarding relationships. We hear others share many similar problems regarding their relationships which we are also encountering: loneliness, confusion, difficulties with intimacy, the need to be in control or to exert power over others, sexual problems, resentments towards those we love and others, isolation from others, fear of rejection, confusion about the nature of God and over who we really are, and the list seems to go on and on. Where do we begin in order to restore our relationships and constructively deal with the overwhelming feelings we have? Most of have come to realize that in order for us to develop more effective ways of dealing with relationships, we must first understand and accept that part of our addiction which results in our disconnecting from ourselves, others, and God - "our spiritual condition".

ADDICTION AS A SPIRITUAL DISEASE

Most of us came to Narcotics Anonymous for help with a "drug problem". We listened for the "cure", and we learned that we are "powerless" over more than our compulsive use of drugs. We are powerless over our disease of "addiction". We learned that our addiction is much more than a "drug problem". It encompasses our destructive thinking and negative attitudes, our overwhelming emotions, our relationships with ourselves, others, and God, as well as the compulsive using behavior and perhaps other compulsive behavior patterns. After listening to others share their stories, and after attending more meetings, we come to learn that we are dealing with a disease which is primarily spiritual in nature. We hear others talk about that N.A. program being a "spiritual program". At first we were lost. What does this mean? We heard others say that by the time they found the N.A. program they were spiritually dead. This confused us even more. We listened and later learned that our spiritual condition refers to the "disconnectedness" which occurs as a result of our disease. We begin to disconnect from ourselves, others, and God as our disease grows. Looking back, many of us remember feeling "different" or uncomfortable around others even before we began using. We had difficulty "fitting" in, we didn't feel good enough, we were always comparing ourselves to others - either feeling less than others, or as a result of our defensiveness, making ourselves out to be better than others. We never seemed to be on an equal basis with anyone. We didn't understand why, but we felt something was missing in our lives. We were not complete. We learned that this void, our spiritual condition, helped to make us vulnerable to destructiveness. How? We tried many ways to fill this void in our lives, but nothing ever seemed to satisfy it. Our first experiences with drugs seemed to give us a real sense of satisfaction, relief, and pleasure, one which we have not known before using.
Many of us could look back at our first days of using and see that we became "instantaneously" addicted to using after experiencing that first high and feeling we finally fit in with a group of people who were like us and accepted us now that we got high. We did not realize that this attempt to fulfill our spiritual needs with a physical substance was the beginning of our spiritual death. Using became our number one priority at any and all expense, for we really could not satisfy this intense hunger we had through the use of substance or substances. Yet we tried. This led us to become progressively self centered as our disease grew. We wanted to feel good, so we used. The more we used, the more we became dependent on using and the less good we felt. Our preoccupation with using forced us to become self centered, concentrating solely on how we could get the drug(s) we wanted when we wanted it( them). Out thinking became more distorted and as we became less able to see ourselves as we really are - addicts, losing more and more control to our addiction. We therefore became more disconnected from our real selves. What we were on the inside was different than what we portrayed on the outside. In reality, we felt lonely, afraid, unsure, guilty, and confused. At other times, however, we might have felt happy, confident and even joyful for apparently no reason. In any case, our emotions ran at extremes - high and low, hardly ever at a manageable pace. We sought escape from the lows and we sought desperately to intensify the highs. Feelings were just too much for us to handle, so we used to avoid them. Once under the influence of drugs, we could be anything or anyone we wanted to be. We lived in fantasy world where we convinced ourselves that despite the pain, our responsibilities, the consequences of our using, taking the next drug would somehow make things better. For a while this seemed to work, but as time went on, our disease demanded more and more from us until we had nothing left to give. We gave out total selves to our addiction. We became what our disease wanted us to be - slaves to it's power. We no longer knew who we were and why we were doing what we were doing. We completely disconnected from our real selves. And this disconnection from self was only the beginning of our spiritual death. As our disease continued, we became more and more dissatisfied with ourselves and our lives. At the same time we knew we could not stop this destructive pattern of living. Many of us have tried so many times. Those who loved us and cared for us began to confront us and to try to help us. Our own dissatisfaction with self and our loss of control over our use scared us and confused us. This "powerlessness" also helped to fuel anger and frustration inside of us as our dissatisfaction with self grew and our attempts to change failed. We projected our anger and frustration onto those who loved us. We blamed them for our condition, and for the problems that were resulting due to our addiction. Resentment built. It became so painful for us to see what was happening in our lives that we projected this frustration onto others. We became critical, judgmental, and resentful of others so that we could not have to face up to our own sense of failure.
We placed fault everywhere but on ourselves. We could not see that our critical, judgmental, and resentful attitudes were producing two very destructive consequences; first of all, these feelings helped to fuel the addictive process by giving us the excuses to use. By believing that everything and everyone was either against us or did not understand us, it was easier for us to convince ourselves to continue to use. Secondly, the more we placed blame for our shortcomings on others and on events in our lives, the less responsibility we had to take in our own lives. By seeing others as the cause of our problems, we had an excuse to isolate from them. This irrational thinking advanced us further in our spiritual dying process. We not only disconnected from ourselves, but we also began disconnecting from others. We began to isolate ourselves from those who loved us. We no longer needed or wanted others in our life, only more of the substance(s) which was (were) killing us. Others were important to us only insofar as what we could get from them. We demanded and expected the power or control in our relationships with others.
And when they got tired of being used and abused and left us we became so manipulative that many of them came back to us, and when they did not, we would soon find others to use. Our families were usually the first ones to be exploited and the first ones we disconnected from. After all, they were the closest to us, and our disease would not allow us to be involved with anyone on an intimate basis. We were afraid of intimacy. Intimacy meant sharing openly and honestly with others. Our total self-centered attitudes prevented us from experiencing true intimacy. We could not be a responsible member or partner in an intimate relationship. We used others as compulsively as we used drugs. Our families couldn't understand our irrational thinking and bizarre behavior and many times they became preoccupied with attempts to change us. We pushed them away. We told them to stay out of our lives, we blamed them for our troubles and the consequences of our using. Being emotionally immature as a result of our addiction preventing us the opportunity to grow, as well as being powerless over our disease, we could not accept the responsibility for our behavior. So we did not. Little by little we grew further and further from our families. The more our disease grew, the more distant we became, and the more our families tried to help. They tried in desperation to break through the barriers of our addiction, but many of them soon discovered their own sense of powerlessness. In utter despair, they may have detached from us. As a result, some of us experienced the painful reality of divorce, separation, being locked out of their homes, and/or being turned in to the police by our families. They could not take our abuse any longer. Our disease was so powerful, it not only made us sick, but our families as well. There were those families who became so sick by our disease that they could not detach from us at all. They became "addicted" to us and their own irrational behavior served to enable our self-destructive thinking and behavior. This made it easier and more comfortable for us to continue with our using lifestyle. We became pros at using these people, exerting power over them by manipulating them, and subsequently hurting them, all in efforts to get what they wanted - another high. And we knew, despite our families threats to take action, they would or could not. They were sick too. Many of us became so disconnected from our families that we felt little or no guilt or remorse over the ways we would hurt them. They were like strangers to us as we were like strangers to ourselves. As addiction gained more and more control over our lives, we began to disconnect from our spouse, lovers and friends also. Friends were those who would support our using lifestyle, those we used with and/or those we obtained drugs from. Non-using friends were dropped very quickly as they had nothing to offer us. Our spouse or lover became a victim of our addiction as well. Like our families, we ignored, mistreated, used and hurt anyone who stood in the way of our using. After so much abuse, even our closest friends, if we had any left, stayed away from us. Those who did remain in contact, we isolated from. We became alone and lonely. However, our need for intimacy was still present. It seemed like the only relationships we would allow where any intimacy existed was a sexual relationship. But even here intimacy was purely physical, and as a result many of us could not even handle a sexual relationship without problems. Our values had deteriorated. Love became equivalent to sex; as we could not handle the responsibility of giving which true love demands of us. Just like we used our families and friends to get what we wanted, we used our spouse or lover as well. We were starved for intimacy, yet the very nature of the self-centeredness of addiction did not allow for this intimacy beyond a physical or sexual manual. Once again, we were relying on our spiritual needs to be met through physical ways. Sex becomes a "high" for us also. It too helped to fill the void in us without demanding the risk, commitment, or the responsibility that an inmate relationship demands. It was the "safe" way to feel wanted, accepted, and loved. But even here we could not seem to get enough. So we cheated on our lover, we lied to them, we demanded sex from them whenever we wanted it or we used sex as a weapon against our lover. We were not able to care about their needs or wants, only our own. We exerted physical and emotional power over them as we needed so badly to be in control, yet we were not in control at all. We could not control our lives, we could not care for anyone, not even ourselves. We were living like animals, completely out of instinct. We wanted what we wanted when we wanted it. We sought out our victims and we used them. And if we denied our wants, we learned to con so well that it became a game to us. Once this process began, it took over our lives completely, so that even when we wanted out of this way of living, until we sought help through Narcotics Anonymous, we could not stop this process of destruction. Finally, our spiritual death became complete with our disconnectedness to our God. Some of us never believed in God to begin with. We felt we didn't need a God. Our disease made us so self-centered that we believed we were the center of the universe, and that the world should evolve around our wants and needs. We made ourselves God. Those of us who were raised with some kind of religious background soon denounced this faith as we became convinced there could be no such being as a loving god who cares for us when our own sense of powerlessness made life seem unbearable. We lost any faith we had. We felt despair, loneliness, fear, and confusion. If God really cared for us why would he allow us to suffer in this way? Those of us who attempted to hold on to our beliefs and faith in a God of our understanding found that our faith lessened as our disease grew. God became a bargaining tool to use when we were in a crisis situation. We promised Him we would change if only He would get us out of the painful situations we were in. And even if we did get out of these situations, we did not change. We used God like we used others. We attempted to make deals with God but yet we knew we could never really live up to the commitments we offered Him. How many times we promised God and others that we would change and yet did not? Even if we were sincere with our promises at the time we made them, we failed to realize the power addictions had over our lives. It always took from us, leaving us with less and less in return. We come to see that this truly is a disease as it is much too powerful for us to fight, although we tried. Our behavior was excessive, we were physically, emotionally, and spiritually sick. And we felt alone and afraid. This is how we came to N.A. We were completely disconnected from ourselves, those who loved us, and our god. We see now that from the moment we entered N.A. our relationships were severely damaged as a result of our "spiritual condition". We need help. And this is why just staying clean is not enough if we are to recover. Our capacity to have meaningful relationships has been damaged by our self-centered attitude and thinking we developed over time as our disease progressed. We come to learn that staying clean is the first step towards building more healthy relationships. But there is more to be done. We can't stop here.

RESTORING OUR RELATIONSHIPS

These self-centered attitudes and thinking we have as addicts are the major obstacles blocking us from having more meaningful relationships. These attitudes lead to our progressive isolation to who we really are, others, and to our God. Consequently, in our efforts to work through the specific problems we may be having in many of our relationships, we must focus beyond these problems or "symptoms" we are experiencing and look at where these conflicts most likely originate - in our self-centered thinking and behavior. Getting and staying clean does not automatically mean our lives have changed. Many of us still function in our past destructive ways long after getting clean. We may find ourselves still making excuses for our irresponsible behavior, manipulating or conning others and God to get what we want, and even hurting others as well as ourselves in so many different ways. We can be clean without recovering. Therefore, even while in the Narcotics Anonymous fellowship, we may find that the isolation we've experienced while using, as a result of our disconnectedness and self centeredness, is still present and even growing. In addition, when we came to N.A. and gave up using drugs, the void we attempted to fill by using drugs in the past is once again exposed and in desperate need for filling. Those of us who came to the fellowship after being separated from our spouse, lover, and/or families, felt this void even more so as two important elements in our lives, using and our loved one(s) are now gone. Like in the past, many of us seek quick, safe ways to fill this void. Some of us result back to using drugs, as this emptiness we feel after getting clean seems to be too much for us to bear. We look for relief once again, and tend to go to where we feel relief will come quickly and easily. Thus, we relapse. Some of us turn to other destructive ways of filling this void. The results are the same, we end up hurting and also vulnerable to relapse. Many of us soon look towards getting involved in an intimate relationship or even multiple relationships, as a way to deal with these lonely and empty feelings we have. However, what we fail to realize is that until we have changed our self-centered attitude, thinking, behavior, any attempts at forming intimate relationships are likely to result in failure, and subsequently, both ourselves and the other person are likely to get hurt. This is then likely to lead us to relapse also. This is why we hear it suggested at meetings to avoid seeking intimate relationships in our initial recovery.
We can't handle these relationships yet. We are still spiritually sick, and therefore, stuck in our self-centeredness. We cannot yet handle the responsibility, the sharing, the caring, the honesty, the open-mindedness, the risk taking, the commitments, or in other words, the unconditional giving and sharing of love which real intimacy demands. until we change from being self-centered to being otherly centered. this is why so many of us experience many difficulties in our relationships during early recovery. We are still imprisoned to self, and this is evident by how we perceive the difficulties we're having in relationships. Our focus tends to be entirely on how badly we are being treated by others, what was done to us, and how much we hurt as a result. we cannot even begin to see the role we take in producing these conflicts. Our interpretation is completely one sided, we see ourselves solely as victims, we can do no wrong. It's no wonder we have these conflicts! Once we come to the realization that we have to change, and that this self-centered thinking or acting has to go, we realize the difficult task ahead of us. It is not easy to change. We begin by getting clean first. We then come to see that there are many times we are not even aware that our thinking or actions are destructive, and that we are being self-centered.
How do we change these patterns? Fortunately for us, Narcotics Anonymous has given us the tools for change. They come in the form of the 12 steps. When we take a close look at each of the 12 steps we see that they are entirely based upon spiritual principles. The working and living of these steps are the ways we come to reconnect with our real selves, others and the God of our understanding. This also results in our change from being self-centered to being otherly-centered. This is recovery. We learn how to love. It's only through this process that we become whole again, as the void in our lives finally becomes filled in a way we've never experienced before, in a way that works, and more importantly, that lasts. This process is our spiritual awakening. We hear members who have worked the steps and are now doing their best to live them in their daily lives share how different their lives are today. We see how serene they appear, how content with life they seem to be, and we feel the love that has developed in them. They know real intimacy. They have become truly connected in a spiritual way to themselves, others, and God. We want what they have. Our experience shows that those recovering addicts who are having on-going and/or severe problems in their relationships probably have not worked the steps at all, or have not yet incorporated the steps into their daily lives. Many of us still find excuses for not working the steps. We put them off. We tell ourselves that we don't need to work them, we work them with little or no effort, or we work them too quickly, then denying ourselves their true value. As addicts, we are fighters. We fight anything we don't understand, don't agree with, that appears too difficult, that demands risk, or takes time. We want the quick, easy way. We want it our way. Should this way of thinking persist, we will eventually use. Our experience shows that self-destructive thinking will always almost lead to self-destructive behavior in one form or another. Those of us who finally begin working the steps soon begin to see and feel the positive changes in our lives. This helps us to continue on with our program, and we want all we can get. The steps help us to change slowly over time, giving us the tools to re-connect with ourselves, others, and God. They work in a simple format, giving us the simple tasks to do. We work them one by one, in order. We begin to get out of our self-centeredness. The first step begins this process by teaching us the importance of honestly looking at ourselves, and seeing ourselves as we really are. This leads us to reconnect with our true selves, as we stop believing those false notions we've had about ourselves in the past. We stop making excuses for our past. We accept our reality. "We admitted we were powerless over our addiction, that our lives had become unmanageable". We do this by allowing ourselves to see the consequences of our addiction, and the eventual destructiveness which always resulted. This is our addictive nature. We are addicts. For some of us, this takes a long time to admit. We may fight this and thereby return to using. Others of us may have come to our first N.A. meeting accepting ourselves as addicts. Regarding our relationships, in the past we attempted to control, manipulate, and con others. We wanted others to be the way we wanted them. We learn by working the first step that our powerlessness extends beyond our past using behavior. Our thinking and attitudes are also part of our disease of addiction. When we think we can control or change others, or when the addict in us attempts to manipulate or con others, the results are chaos - our lives become unmanageable. We find that we can stop using drugs and still think and act destructively. By seeing ourselves as we really are, we realize that we cannot manage our own lives without the help from others. Thus we move on to the second step to begin to connect with a source of strength. "We came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity". In our using days, we made ourselves the center of the universe. We denied we needed help, and we could not see our irrational or insane thinking and behavior for what it was. In our relationships, we also denied the need for help with problems we were having. We accused others of acting crazy, yet denying our own insanity. We continue to look at ourselves as we really are. This step gives us the faith and hope. We realize our need for help by a power greater than ourselves. By working towards building faith in a source of strength, and by practicing this faith, we begin to have hope in ourselves and in our recovery, thus we become more fully connected to ourselves and connected to the God of our understanding. The sanity we are restored to is the change in our thinking and behavior. We begin to get out of the self-centeredness and destructiveness we were trapped in, thereby freeing us to think and to act more rationally. We learn to rely on our God for continued strength. As our recovery grows, we begin to trust more and more in our God and we see the value to this trust. This helps us to continue to take risks, and to trust more. We become ready to work the third step. "We made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understand Him". In our past, we demanded things and others to go our way. We were impatient, impulsive, greedy people who demanded what we wanted when we wanted it. We were like this in our relationships also. We demanded from others, putting our needs and wants first, hardly ever allowing their needs and wants to come first unless we were attempting to set them up to get something we wanted from them later. We played these games with people. Working the third step requires a dramatic change in us. The God of our understanding becomes our lifeline for the strength we need to make this change. We no longer doubt, ignore, or manipulate God, rather we practice doing His will to the best of our ability. We begin loving others unconditionally. We accept life on it's own terms. It's no longer as important to have things our way. Our self centeredness is continuing to diminish. For most of us this is a very difficult change to make in our lives. Yet we know that if we are going to achieve any measure of serenity in our recovery, we must be willing to do our best in working this step. Our attachment to our God then strengthens, as our faith increases and we become ready to take more demanding risks. We begin to accept others for who they are also, instead of trying to make them conform to our will. This helps to remove many difficulties we've had in our relationships. We find we need to concentrate on our own personal growth, and let others grow their own way, in their own time. Not my will, but Thine be done. After continuing to practice the principles in the first three steps, we find we have the strength and the courage to look at ourselves more closely in order to continue this process of change. We move on to the fourth step. "We made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves". This too is a radical change for us. Prior to working our program, we were constantly taking other people's inventories, pointing out their defects, putting them down for their shortcomings, and laughing at their mistakes. Consequently, this led to many arguments, hurt feelings, and separations in these relationships. Now the focus has shifted. We look at a deeper level at who we really are, and what we're really all about. We see our character defects as well as our assets. This reinforces the true connection we have begun to build with ourselves. We remove the

masks we wore, which serve to isolate us from ourselves, from reality, from others, and from God, and we see our inner selves. Although this is painful at first, we need to go through with it if we are going to continue our program of change. We realize we need to know where we must change in order to work on changing in these areas. The strength and courage to unmask ourselves comes from continued practice of the first three steps. We learn how to be honest with ourselves. We then become ready to become honest with others. We move on to the fifth step. "We admitted to God, to ourselves, and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs". In our past using days, we lived secretive lives. Much of our using may have been to hide our feelings or emotions which were too difficult for us to deal with. When others noticed that something was wrong and tried to help us, we often denied that there was a problem. We hid ourselves from others, isolating more and more as our addiction grew. In our efforts to hide from our own inadequacies, we focused on what we perceived was wrong in others. This kept us from getting too close to them. Thus we felt safe. We now begin to put the focus on coming out of the shell we've made. This takes a lot of courage, strength, and trust. We begin by honestly admitting the nature of our wrongs, the self-centeredness behind each action, to ourselves and to our God. This continues to strengthen our connection to ourselves and to our God. We then seek to also strengthen our connection to others. We open ourselves completely to one other person, honestly sharing our past with that person. We no longer hold on to the secrets we've kept for so long. We feel a sense of relief and acceptance afterwards. This is what we've been looking for all along! We begin to see what real intimacy is all about.
Prior to this, we've known intimacy only in a physical way. Most of us, upon completion of our fifth step, feel a real sense of connection to ourselves, God, and the person we've shared with, in a way we've never known before. We are growing along spiritual lines. This gives us the willingness to begin the difficult task of working on our character defects. We move on to the sixth step. "We were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character". In our past, we demanded commitment from others in our lives. We not only wanted others to do what we wanted them to do, we also demanded that they be there when we wanted them to be. Our addiction would not allow us to live up to any commitments to them. We demanded from them, but rarely could follow through on commitments ourselves. Naturally, our relationships suffered as a result. This was our self-centeredness in control. Now we focus on committing ourselves to continual change. We ready ourselves for this change by making a commitment to ourselves and to our God, willing to do our part in the process of change. Once again, this strengthens our reconnection process. We become ready to commit ourselves to this change when we honestly admit that the past destructive ways of thinking and acting must be surrendered, and the principles of the 12 Steps of N.A. need to take their place. We realize that holding on to any of these old ideas, attitudes, or behaviors, will only serve to keep us in a self-centered way of thinking. We make this commitment to change. We're now ready for our seventh step. "We humbly asked him to remove our shortcomings". We know that we can't change by ourselves. In the past using days, we had difficulty asking for help, as we felt we had all the answers. This only helped to close us off from reality as well as from others. We became isolated in our closed-mindedness. We now realize that if we are to truly change these character defects, we must acknowledge these weaknesses, and ask for His help. We begin to listen to suggestions instead of turning ourselves off to the help of others. We deepen our relationship with our God by accepting his power as the source of the strength we need to make the necessary changes in our lives. We deepen our connection with ourselves by keeping us focused on these character defects which need to be changed, thus continuing to see ourselves as we really are. At the same time, we deepen our commitment to ourselves by striving towards spiritual growth. We then become ready to deepen our commitment to restore our relationships. We work on our eighth step. "We made a list of all persons we had harmed, and became willing to make amends to them all". Since many of us have experienced conflicts in our relationships which stemmed from our own inability to admit our wrongs and blaming others for everything that went wrong in these relationships, in a completely non-self-centered way, we must now look at all those that we had harmed by this self-centeredness. Our attitude is changing. We are no longer as self-centered as in our using days. We take an honest look at how we hurt others. In the past, we could only see how we have been hurt. We became ready to make these amends, and go on to our night step. "We made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others". At this point our attitude must be completely unselfish. Our goal is to restore our relationships to the best of our ability. Therefore, we must be careful at how we approach others. We do not want to hurt or injure them. We are beginning to think about the welfare of others. We are beginning to care about them also. We learn the spiritual principle of forgiveness by actually making amends. Once again this action allows us to experience a real sense of intimacy if we do it in an unselfish manner, expecting nothing in return. This strengthens our connection to our true selves, others, and God. We become close and begin to feel the connection we're making as real. By attempting to right our wrongs, we feel a sense of peacefulness with ourselves. By allowing ourselves to see our own weaknesses, we are better able to accept the weaknesses in others also. Suddenly, resentments we may have held towards others diminish as we focus on righting our own wrongs. We recognize that if this sense of serenity we feel is going to last at all, we must continue practicing the principles we've learned in our daily lives. We are becoming more spiritually connected. But we know that it's easy to fall back into our old ways. Some of us have gotten stuck and fallen back. We must continue working towards spiritual growth or we begin isolating ourselves and our thoughts may once again become self-centered. We guard against this by working our tenth step daily. "We continued to take personal inventory and when we were wrong promptly admitted it". The way we've found to keep ourselves in touch with who we really are, and our relationships to our God and to others is by daily inventory. We must continue to check up on our attitudes. We must ask ourselves regularly if we've been at all self-centered in our daily affairs. In our dealings with others, we must look at any ways we've...
acted selfishly and make immediate amends to those affected by this behavior. It's the only way to keep us from falling back into that dreadful trap of isolation and fear. By keeping daily tabs on our self-centeredness, we notice that our relationships are improving dramatically. We are no longer focused on what we can get out of others but what we can offer to them. This is what unconditional love is all about. We recognize the importance of continued strength from the God of our understanding. We want to improve this relationship with Him. We move onto the eleventh step. "We sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God, as we understand Him, praying only for the knowledge of his will for us and the power to carry that out". Another way we keep ourselves from falling back to self-centeredness is by asking God daily for the strength we need to do his will. We continue to do our part by surrendering our will over to Him. We ask him to show us the way. We are now truly connected to him, as well as to ourselves, and to others. Our self-centeredness diminishes. We feel spiritually alive, a part of instead of apart from. We no longer feel that void in our lives. We feel complete. We work our twelfth step. "Having had a spiritual awakening as a result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to addicts, and to practice these principles in all our affairs". We learn that the only way to keep what we have is by giving it away. Whereas in the past, we did not and could not care for anyone, including ourselves, due to the nature of addiction, today we begin to reach out to those who still suffer in attempts to help. We begin to care about them. We now see and feel what real love is all about. We learn to love unconditionally, without expecting anything in return. We apply this principle to all of our relationships. We're coming out of ourselves. We experience real intimacy through the living of spiritual principles in our lives. Principles such as honesty, open-mindedness, willingness, faith, hope, trust, sharing, risk-taking, commitment, humility, spiritual growth, forgiveness, caring and unconditional love have given us that true connection we have been searching for all along. We do our best to incorporate these principles in all areas of our lives. Our relationships strengthen. We have begun to build the characteristics needed for intimate relationships to grow and strengthen by the working and the living of the twelve steps. Our love grows. We are truly spiritual beings, who've suffered from a spiritual illness. We are now ready to share the love we have with others in many different ways and in a variety of roles. We see that by living these principles, we can handle and enjoy an intimate relationship with that someone special. We are not perfect, but we have become so much better, and we have the tools for continued growth. We become free not only from our past using, but also from the self-centered destructiveness in our thinking and our attitudes. We're free to love and it shows! Others become attracted to us as they see our new way of life, problems are dealt with more simply and more effectively, and our serenity lasts longer. We find we have the capacity to have meaningful relationships today because our focus is on loving others instead of what we can get from them. We have something to offer and it feels good to give of ourselves. And the more we give of the love we have, the more this love grows! We see our relationships being restored and we feel a true connection to life. We are truly recovering and our relationships reflect this spiritual progress.
